The ability to be open-source makes it more useful and allows it to be used as an academic tool. It allows many other graphic designers and artists to use it to develop concepts for client work. How to download and install First, make sure you have a Windows or Mac install of the latest version of Photoshop or Photoshop Elements. If you don't, you can download the software here. If you need to install the software, follow the instructions provided by the manufacturer. Next, download the Creative Cloud app for Photoshop or Photoshop Elements, which is included in the download of the software you've just downloaded. Open it and follow the instructions to install and set up the Creative Cloud. Once you are done, you can start your free trial. Now to start editing your images, follow these steps: Click the use Photoshop Elements icon at the top left of your screen. This will open the software. Double-click the Start Tab. This will open the software on a black screen. Click the Image Tool on the top toolbar. This will open the toolbox. Click the usual edit tools icon: This will open the normal edit tools found in the professional version of Photoshop. The filter tools can be found by clicking this icon: This will open the advanced filter tools. Using Photoshop elements This tutorial assumes you are editing one image at a time. You can also edit multiple images at once. Here's how: Select your image in your image editor. Click the flannel icon on the top toolbar: This will open a small panel on the right: This can be used to open/close images in Photoshop Elements. Click anywhere to select a brush tool. Then you click an image. It will automatically open on the left of the image you just clicked: You can then drag and drop the image to resize and position it. Or double-click the image to edit it. If you want to edit the background, click the tool icon on the top toolbar and choose Background: This will bring up a grey semi-transparent background for you to edit. Here's a quick way to rotate and flip images: Click the button in the upper left corner. This will open the 05a79cecff

Photo: Mario Tama/Getty Images As the Supreme Court readies to hand down its first big vote since Justice Clarence Thomas became the court's newest member, the country's highest court is slipping deeper into its conservative-led slide. A new study from the Pew Research Center released this week found just eight percent of Americans surveyed believe the Supreme Court is "somewhat" or "very" likely to develop the vision and leadership to help steer the country in a new direction. The study, by the way, does not include Justice Thomas, who took his seat this term, and only gives a brief snapshot of how the American public views the Supreme Court now, as opposed to when Barack Obama nominated Sonia Sotomayor for the high court in 2009. The numbers on the Supreme Court, the study found, have grown far more lukewarm in the years since the court has become synonymous with the far-right. It was 54 percent in 2013, and just 43 percent now. That Republican approval has slipped from 63 percent in 2013 to 37 percent now. And a huge chunk of the population, the study found, continues to disapprove of the current state of the high court, with 41 percent holding a negative opinion of the court, as opposed to only 29 percent who do not. No, the nadir for the Supreme Court was not 2008. That was before Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts, two-thirds of its conservative wing, cast their votes to eviscerate the rights of unions in a case involving the Colorado public employee unions. "It was awful," CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen told MSNBC. And it was the last time the Supreme Court even received majority Democratic support, but now that Republicans are so entrenched on the court, the chances of the legal affairs of the United States being turned on its head seem unlikely — at least, not anytime soon. The Cato Institute, in a poll it conducted this year, found nearly nine in 10 Americans believe the Supreme Court is now too "liberal" or "too conservative." Only two percent thought the court was "just right." "And," Cohen notes, "that's a nine-percentage-point drop from a recent high of 21 percent in 2012." "This is not
