Q: Convert array to JSON and save to Mongo I have an array stored in Mongo which I need to convert to JSON and save it. I need to do that because I need to change the script that is saving that array in Mongo and can't as it's written in PHP. I have already tried to convert the array to JSON using JSON.stringify(theArray) and also using the array like this ("display": "hello") But it does not change anything in my database when I change the PHP script. The script in PHP looks like this: if(! $connectado ){ $pdo = new PDO( DB_HOST, DB_USER, DB_PASSWORD ); $pdo->setAttribute( PDO::ATTR_ERRMODE, PDO::ERRMODE_EXCEPTION ); } $array = json_decode($row->Post); $start = $array->Date; $end = $array->Date; $title = $array->Title; $message = $array->Message; $result = $pdo->prepare( "INSERT INTO posts ("date", "title", "message") VALUES (?,?,?)" ); $result->execute( $date, $title, $message ); The $row variable is the one that returns the array when I do a select query. I'm using MongoDB and PHP. A: You just need to store a document in mongodb like this db.posts.

On what scenario the RuntimeServices have different functionality from the Runtime? A: For a single service on a single machine it makes sense to use the RuntimeService. For services which will be running on a farm of machines it makes sense to use the RuntimeService. See: A: The documentation is not so explicit about the difference, but the basic difference is that the runtime services are running on the server where your web application is. In ASP.NET the runtime services are the parts of the framework that make sure that your application will function even if something goes wrong. For example, if your application does not have access to a database, the runtime services can create a local in-memory database for you. If you are using a web site, the
